Interval House and Attorney General Richard Blumenthal are leading a campaign to educate men about ending the cycle of domestic violence.

The campaign will reach out to men in Interval House's 24-town service area, and ask them to commit themselves to promoting domestic violence awareness and supporting Interval House with their talent and influence.

"I am determined to enlist men from across the state in this critical battle against domestic violence," Blumenthal said. "Recent Connecticut events tragically demonstrate the need for education and services related to domestic violence -- a crime that knows no ethnic or economic boundaries and often happens undetected, sometimes for years, until disaster strikes. This campaign is vitally important now more than ever. We must educate men on how to recognize abuse, intervene, seek help and enlist others in the campaign to stop domestic violence."

"We are thrilled that the Attorney General has agreed to take on this leadership role," said Rosemary Padin, Interval House development director. "For years the Attorney General has been a champion for the issues surrounding domestic violence in our state, and been a staunch friend of Interval House and its mission."
